

February 14, 2006

Welcome to “3rd Wednesday” for the TriBakery group.

Every third Wednesday of the month at the TriBakery group we postpone our normal group discussion so we can grow not only by the content discussed but likewise through the friendships formed. So get something to eat, and something to drink, sit down and introduce yourself to those around you. We hope you brought some of your work. Feel free to show it to those around you. If you are having trouble finding something to talk about perhaps the quote below could help stir discussion or in the very least it could make you think?

Enjoy,
Kirk

Quote:

“...I have found it helpful to see culture operating within two broad strands of history which are decreed and ruled by God: Culturative history (the history of the process of culture) and redemptive history (the history of human salvation wrought by God). I should stress at the outset that these two strands of history are not unconnected from one another, but since the Fall, they have been closely intertwined and in some instances (i.e. the building of the tabernacle and the Temple) have been identical. Nevertheless these two historical strands must be considered separately for at least two reasons. First, man’s ‘cultural mandate’ – the call to rule, fill, and transform the earth – was established before the Fall and exists independently of man’s need for redemption. God clearly had an initial, basic plan for the development of the newly created earth, which included mankind’s cultural involvement. Since this plan was instituted prior to the fall of man into sin, we may properly call culture (along with the other ‘pre-redemptive’ institutions of marriage and worship) normative for mankind. Second, it becomes clear both in the pages of Scripture and by historical observation that it has pleased God to allow a significant portion of the cultural development of the earth to be effectuated by those outside the covenant (or church).”

David Bruce Hegeman, Plowing in Hope: Toward a Biblical Theology of Culture

February 14, 2006

Welcome to “3rd Wednesday” for the TriBakery group.

Every third Wednesday of the month at the TriBakery group we postpone our normal group discussion so we can grow not only by the content discussed but likewise through the friendships formed. So get something to eat, and something to drink, sit down and introduce yourself to those around you. We hope you brought some of your work. Feel free to show it to those around you. If you are having trouble finding something to talk about perhaps the quote below could help stir discussion or in the very least it could make you think?

Enjoy,
Kirk

Quote:

“...I have found it helpful to see culture operating within two broad strands of history which are decreed and ruled by God: Culturative history (the history of the process of culture) and redemptive history (the history of human salvation wrought by God). I should stress at the outset that these two strands of history are not unconnected from one another, but since the Fall, they have been closely intertwined and in some instances (i.e. the building of the tabernacle and the Temple) have been identical. Nevertheless these two historical strands must be considered separately for at least two reasons. First, man’s ‘cultural mandate’ – the call to rule, fill, and transform the earth – was established before the Fall and exists independently of man’s need for redemption. God clearly had an initial, basic plan for the development of the newly created earth, which included mankind’s cultural involvement. Since this plan was instituted prior to the fall of man into sin, we may properly call culture (along with the other ‘pre-redemptive’ institutions of marriage and worship) normative for mankind. Second, it becomes clear both in the pages of Scripture and by historical observation that it has pleased God to allow a significant portion of the cultural development of the earth to be effectuated by those outside the covenant (or church).”

David Bruce Hegeman, Plowing in Hope: Toward a Biblical Theology of Culture